REFRESHMENT AREA:
NAPOLEONIC (PARTIGIANA) GARDENS

The park dates back to 1807, when Napoleon Bonaparte declared that the city of Venice needed a green area for public use. The planning was entrusted to Giannantonio Selva. In recent times, the garden were divided into two parts. The first part (approx. 42,000 sq. metres) was given to the Biennale Organization which then set up exhibition spaces for the art exposition (30 pavilions for participating nations); the second part (approx. 18,000 sq. metres) was destined to be public gardens. Easily reached by the ACTV lines ("Giardini" stop) the area is noted for its wide shady avenues and is equipped with benches, rubbish bins, a drinkable water fountain, a children's playground, and Veritas n. 9 public rest-rooms.
